Abstract:

This study presents a literature review of Drosophilidae (Diptera) species occurrence in Brazil. The number of species recorded is 304, with Drosophila being the genus with the greatest number of species, followed by Zygothrica, Hirtodrosophila and Diathoneura, which belong to the Drosophilinae subfamily. Drosophila was shown to be the most investigated taxon in the family, with the best resolved species distribution. The low number of records of species from other genera indicates the paucity of studies specifically designed to investigate these species. Records of species for some regions of the country like the north and northeast, as well as for some biomes like Caatinga, Pantanal and the Pampas, are likewise rare. Apart from the banana bait, different collection methods may be necessary, like the collection at other oviposition resources, the use of baits other than fermenting fruit, and the adoption of sampling approaches that do not use baits.

Introduction

Drosophilidae species have been described since 1787, when Fabricius characterized Musca funebris, which later was repositioned in a new genus and became Drosophila funebris, the type-species of the family. Today, Drosophilidae encompass 3,952 species distributed in 73 genera belonging to two subfamilies (Bächli 2007), Steganinae and Drosophilinae. Two monotypic genera, Apacrochaeta Duda 1927 and Sphyrnoceps de Meijere 1916, have not been included in any subfamily.

Drosophilinae is the most diversified subfamily, with 3,240 species distributed across 44 genera (Bächli 2007), among which Drosophila Fallén 1823 is the largest, with 1,149 species recorded. When compared to the data obtained by Ashburner (1989), the number of Drosophila species is smaller, because some of the subgenera it originally contained were raised to genus level, such as Scaptodrosophila (Duda 1923), Hirtodrosophila (Duda 1923) and Lordiphosa (Basden 1961) (Grimaldi 1990a). Moreover, several Hawaiian species and the Antopocerus genus (Kaneshiro 1976) were incorporated into the genus Idiomyia Grimshaw 1901, while the subgenus Engiscaptomyza (Kaneshiro 1969), also native to Hawaii, was relocated to Scaptomyza Hardy 1849 (Grimaldi 1990a; O'Grady et al. 2003).

The subfamily Steganinae, which conserves several primitive characteristics of the family, nowadays comprises 702 species that belong to 29 genera (Bächli 2007). The Drosophilidae genera and respective number of species are listed in Table 1.

Sturtevant (1921) studied the distribution of Drosophilidae species known in the different biogeographic zones, and originally found 82 species distributed across 13 genera in Neotropical region. Yet, nowadays these numbers are downsized to 70 and 10, respectively, as the genera Curtonotum (Macquart 1843), Blaesochaetophora (Czerny 1904) and Aulacigaster (Macquart 1835), which contained 12 of the species listed by Sturtevant, have been relocated into other families.

More specifically, Sturtevant (1921) reports the presence of six genera and 23 species of the family in South America. With the increase in the number of studies on the Neotropical fauna, some species lists were prepared in certain countries, specially for the Drosophila genus, like Mexico (Patterson and Mainland 1944), El Salvador (Heed 1957), Colombia (Hunter 1969), Venezuela (Hunter 1970) and Chile (Brncic 1987). These lists include the one prepared for Brazil by Mourão et al. (1965).

Thus, the lists and nomenclature studies were somehow common for Drosophila in the past (apart from those already mentioned, there are the studies by Patterson and Wheeler (1949), Patterson and Stone (1952) and Wheeler (1959). Yet, the survey made by Val et al. (1981) has so far been the largest compilation of data on Neotropical drosophilids, addressing relevant knowledge of species distribution and ecology. Considering the recent taxonomy studies, specially those by G. Bächli, D. Grimaldi and C.R. Vilela, as well as the species and ecology surveys conducted, mainly those by F.M. Sene, R. Tidon, F.C. Val and V.L.S. Valente and coworkers, the panorama of Drosophilidae species distribution and diversity in Brazil has indeed been enlarged.

Material and Methods

This study is a compilation of data obtained from a wide-ranging literature review of the records of Drosophilidae species in Brazil. The authors are aware that some of the extant records may not have been recovered in the survey process. The information retrieved was not necessarily wholly generated in studies on Drosophilidae taxonomy or ecology, since the studies consulted include those focused on evolution, population genetics, descriptive and comparative biology of the genus, for which several records were made over collections directed to find certain species. Only the Brazilian states where each species was recorded are indicated in the geographic distribution information.

Results and Discussion

The present literature review found 304 Drosophilidae species distributed in 18 genera in Brazil (Table 2, Appendix I). Among the genera recorded, Chymomyza Czerny 1903, Cladochaeta Coquillett 1900, Dettopsomyia Lamb 1914, Diathoneura Duda 1924, Drosophila, Hirtodrosophila, Microdrosophila Malloch 1921, Mycodrosophila Oldenberg 1914, Neotanygastrella Duda 1925, Scaptodrosophila, Scaptomyza, Zaprionus Coquillett 1901 and Zygothriza Wiedemann 1830 belong to the Drosophilinae subfamily; in turn, Amiota Loew 1862, Leucophenga Mik 1886, Pseudiaastata Coquillett 1908, Rhinoleucophenga Hendel 1917 and Stegana Meigen 1830 rank under the Steganinae subfamily. Figure 1 shows the number of species recorded for each genus, revealing two prominent genera: Drosophila and Zygothrica. Ashburner (1989) mentions the probability that the American species of the Gitona genus in fact belong to Rhinoleucophenga. This classification has been accepted by Bächli (2007) and we followed suit. The genus Microdrosophila was collected by Val and Kaneshiro (1988) in the state of São Paulo, though no species was determined in that study. The authors point to these species as likely non-described species, and therefore they are not shown in Figure 1.

LISTS OF SPECIES

Thirteen species recorded are exotic - Dettopsomyia formosa Lamb 1914, D. nigrovittata Malloch 1924, Drosophila ananassae Doleschall 1858, D. busckii Coquillett 1901, D. immigrans Sturtevant 1921, D. kikkawai Burla 1954, D. malerkotliana Parshad and Paika 1964, D. melanogaster Meigen 1830, D. simulans Sturtevant 1919, D. virilis Sturtevant 1916, Scaptodrosophila latifasciaeformis Duda 1940, S. lebanonensis Wheeler 1949 and Zaprionus indianus Gupta 1970 - though the majority of the total number is endemic to the New World (Malogolowkin 1946; Hardy 1959; Wheeler 1981; Grimaldi and Nguyen 1999). Yet, only Cladochaeta, Diathoneura, Pseudiaastata and Rhinoleucophenga are genera for which all species are endemic to the New World (Malogolowkin 1946; Hardy 1959; Wheeler 1981; Grimaldi and Nguyen 1999). All other genera have species also in other biogeographic regions, such as Zygothrica, which up to the 1980's was considered an exclusive Neotropical genus (Burla, 1956) and for which some species from Africa and Samoa were only recently described (Grimaldi 1990b; Prigent and Toda 2006).

Drosophila was the genus with most species and the most comprehensively studied in Brazil, which is reflected in the largest size and abundance of Drosophila and Sophophora subgenera. This should come as no surprise, as Drosophila is widely employed in genetic, evolutionary and behavioral studies worldwide (Powell 1997). Apart from being a model organism in several fields of genetics and evolutionary biology, Drosophila has gained the same status in ecology and conservation investigations (Martins, 2001; Tidon et al. 2005). In the light of the fact that Drosophila is strongly attracted by baits prepared with fermented fruit, a considerable number of researchers have chosen the approach to collect specimens for their studies.

This feeding preference of drosophilids has made this collection methodology quite popular among researchers on the area, which explains why most studies resort to this kind of bait (Pavan 1959; Sene et al. 1980; Tidon 2006; De Toni et al. 2007; among others). This bait attracts mainly the frugivorous species, such as most drosophilid species recorded in Brazil, while species that are only seldom attracted include fungivorous, florivorous, cactophilic and leaf-mining species, and/or species that feed on decomposing wood or that show parasitic/predatory behavior.

LISTS OF SPECIES

This large volume of information on one same taxon is highly relevant for the knowledge on the dynamics of the Neotropical fauna, as it is only based on model organisms or taxa that researchers may clarify issues related to biodiversity, species interaction, metapopulation dynamics, endemism areas and others.

In spite of the several studies on Drosophila conducted in Brazil as a whole, these studies do not evenly cover all the country's territory (Table 3, Figure 2). Most species have been recorded in southeastern Brazil, where the research on Drosophila actually started with some studies conducted at specific collection sites. Some surveys have lately been carried out in southern Brazil, specially on the coast of the State of Santa Catarina, where recent species surveys are being conducted by research groups of P.R.P. Hofmann and V.L.S. Valente.

Generally speaking, the northeastern region of the country has produced a relatively small number of records (with the exception of the state of Bahia). Northern Brazil likewise remains little explored, as the number of species expected for the region should be at least similar to that for southeastern and southern Brazil, due to the Amazon biome. If the endemism rates are similar across the different Brazilian biomes, then the Amazon should have the highest species richness, as the area the biome covers exceeds that of the Atlantic Forest biome. The main records for species from the north were generated in ground-breaking papers, such as those by Duda (1925; 1927), and some more recent investigations (Martins 2001; Silva and Martins 2004; De Toni et al. 2005).

LISTS OF SPECIES

Another relevant aspect on is the lack of information on other genera, apart from Drosophila, as all species records are for the states of São Paulo and Rio de Janeiro. These records are sporadic, and the number of studies conducted to investigate these groups in Brazil is very small, when compared to the number of studies on Drosophila. For example, most records for Rhinoleucophenga are from one study only (Malogolowkin 1946). Records absence may be associated to the need for a taxonomic review for some genera, like Amiota, Leucophenga, Microdrosophila, Mycodrosophila, Pseudiaastata, Rhinoleucophenga, Scaptomyza and Stegana. Most species from these genera were described before the 1970's, and the characteristics adopted in the descriptions are unsatisfactory for an ideal characterization of the collected material, since detailed descriptions of male genitalia are required to properly identify collected specimens.

Apart from this, 95 out of the 304 Drosophilidae species in Brazil have one single record. From these 95 single-record, 43 belong to Drosophila and the other 52 belong to genera Chymomyza (four species), Cladochaeta (two species), Diathoneura (eight species), Hirtodrosophila (nine species), Leucophenga (three species), Mycodrosophila (one species), Neotanygastrella (one species), Rhinoleucophenga (five species), Scaptodrosophila (one species), Scaptomyza (one species) and Stegana (one species) (Appendix I).

Val et al. (1981) mention that a large number of Drosophilidae has not been given the deserved attention by researchers. Such scenario has not changed since 1981. Grimaldi (1987) and Grimaldi and Nguyen (1999) report the paucity of information on the genera Zygothrica and Cladochaeta in South America, specially in Brazil, where only four from 124 Cladochaeta described species have been collected.

Yet another aspect that points to the workload expected for researchers on drosophilids is that a considerable number of our species has few records, and in many cases only type locality is known (Val et al. 1981). Zygothrica records for the state of São Paulo, for instance, were virtually all listed by Val and Kaneshiro (1988).

This scenario is common for most Neotropical Diptera families (Brown 2005). Many Diptera species have not even been formally described. Wheeler (1986) estimated that roughly 30% of Drosophila species still remained to be described. Such number was very likely a underestimation, as after 20 years the number of Drosophila species of that time increased by 27%, and even so there is little doubt that all Drosophila species have been described. In 1988, Val and Kaneshiro stated that nearly 50% of the Drosophila species captured in the “Estação Biológica de Boracéia” in the state of São Paulo (the Brazilian state most thoroughly sampled) had never been described. The same was observed for the recent collections conducted by Medeiros and Klaczko (2004). Similar situation was seen in the State of Santa Catarina, where roughly 60 Drosophilidae species collected are yet to be described.

In order to assemble a comprehensive databank for ecological and environmental studies, it is important to complete the roll call of Drosophila species with banana baits across the remaining Brazilian territory. Such importance is explained by the great value drosophilids have as model organisms, even as bioindicators, for a variety of studies (Parsons 1991; Martins 2001; Tidon 2006). At the same time, it is crucial to describe any new species being collected in the territory.

Moreover, as a considerable part of drosophilid material deposited in zoological collections remains uncharacterized, a review of some genera - as said before - and of that material gains relevance to the assessment of Brazilian biodiversity. Also, collection strategies that resort to fruits other than banana are needed, such as the (1) collection at resources onto which Drosophilidae species lay their eggs - as native fruits, fungi, flowers and decomposing leaves, (2) collection using baits with other fermenting fruits, and (3) sampling approaches that do not utilize baits. With this in mind, Malaise baits, which have proved their efficiency to capture Diptera (Brown 2005), could be used. Also, these sample collections should include the different Brazilian biomes — the Atlantic Forest, the Amazon, the Cerrado, the Caatinga, Pantanal and Pampas (IBGE 2006), as the last three are mostly unexplored for the occurrence of the Drosophilid fauna.
